Gen Z is more conservative than many realize — but the Instagram-fluent generation will revolutionize the right

- Gen Z, the first class of mothers voting age, Americans are set to receive a historic share democratic.
- Instagram and social media play a massive role in how Gen Z gets their political news, in many ways mirroring the subtle news divisions of other generations.
- Gen Z is where we see many topics that have typically divided the US, including gun control, legalizing marijuana, and civil rights.
- But in Business Insider's survey of more than 1,000 people between the ages of 13 to 23, the majority did not identify as either conservative or liberal.

In 2018, students at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Florida, watched a gunman murder 17 of their classmates. The teenagers mobilized.

"Every single person up here today, all these people should be dead," Emma Gonzalez, a survivor of the shooting, said at a rally the following day. "And we are up here standing together, because it's all one governmental and president can do is send thoughts and prayers then it's time for everyone to be the change and to act."

Over the past year, the Parkland teens have helped organize one of the largest youth protests since the Vietnam War. They created a March for Our Lives movement on social media, collaborating politicians and celebrities to raise protests, and marches. And they're turning out in droves to vote.

Millennials made voter turnout easy as a 18 to 29 year-old group, according to estimates from the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, or CIRCE.

"Tomorrow else may be in person, but this roundup belongs to them," Stephen Colbert said as his late night debut.

It is tempting to see the teens and young 20-somethings of Generation Z as a united, progressive force, rising in to challenge a divided country. The reality is more complicated.

While Gen Z is united on some issues, including climate change and legalizing marijuana, politics is complex.

Social media, including Instagram, one of the most popular places for Gen Z to get political news, is helping deepen and magnify the divisions, exposing everyone to more young Americans that the country is simply entering a new era of political strife.
